RANDOM HARVEST

An Anthology of Editorials

B.P. Radhakrishna

B.P. Radhakrishna, affectionately known as BPR, is synonymous with the Geological Society of India as its principal architect. His voice finds a reflection in this anthology of editorials written over a span of two decades on a wide range of topics of interest to earth scientists, general public and policy makers. These editorials also chronicle the saga of the growth and development of the Geological Society of India and its flagship Journal that has served the earth science community of the country well. Thus, this publication of the Society is truly a rich harvest, particularly for the younger generation, to browse, reflect, enjoy and find inspiration for the future.

M.S. Rao - Introduction

".... This simply produced book must be read widely, for Radhakrishna writes with enviable clarity and simplicity on some of the most pressing problems of our time - water, environmental degradation, urbanization and conservation. He has, through his writings, been the most articulate champion of geology and allied disciplines, which today are the Cinderellas among the Sciences.

Radhakrishna's essays, some short and others substantial, are unfailingly readable and of special value to uninformed readers like me. While the pages of Current Science carry a great deal of geology, I can hardly count myself as an enthusiast of the earth sciences. It is Radhakrishna's writings that have, for several years, highlighted the importance of a discipline that we need to purposefully exploit for progress."

R Balaram - Current Science

"...This is an extremely valuable publication and very timely to bring into focus how the studies of the earth sciences have been neglected in the country...."
